No shortage of 'roads to nowhere'

Two men and their journey to photograph Wyoming

By Erik Gantt

sunsports@union-tel.com

"What's down this road?" "I don't know, let's go."

This was the discussion between Rich Rosenfeld and Robert "Bo" Edgerton last summer as they put over 4,500 miles on their rental car while photographing some of southeastern Wyoming's most remote spots.

Rich and Bo have been good friends for more than 30 years. Both men worked in the auto parts industry before retiring.

Rich has Wyoming roots working for NAPA stores in Douglas and Casper before the economy went south in the early 1980s. In order to keep up his livelihood Rich moved to the Atlanta, Ga. area where he met Bo. The auto parts dealers formed a bond between themselves and their families in Georgia long before Bo discovered his love of photography and Rich showed Bo the mountains of Wyoming.

Rich calls himself the workhorse of the operation and credits Bo with the talent.

of books that will be a photographic testament to the car up the hill. They made it to the bottom of the Wyoming.

The Saratoga Sun encountered these two daunting publishers at the annual Sierra Madre Muzzleloaders Mountain Man Rendezvous in Encampment. Bo was taking photos and gabbing with Rich when a reporter for the local paper bumped into them.

Instantly, a conversation about photography happened and the two Georgia men related a story about their love of Wyoming and a particularly hairy trip over the Shirley Range.

"We were going over the Shirley Mountain loop road and following lines on the GPS," recalls Rich. He and Bo with an amazing view of the Milky Way, a wind Bo had decided to head out in the afternoon and see where the two-tracks might take them. Eventually, coming down the backside of the mountain they realized the steep mountain road might be a little more than their rental car could handle.

Bo had to get out of the car to move rocks so that Rich could keep driving down the rocky pass. As they progressed, they realized the road was too steep and Together they are working on producing a series narrow to turn around and there was no way to back Continued on page 16 mountain and into the Shirley Basin around 6:30 or 7 p.m. that night only to find a locked gate on the road.

Being familiar with ranchers and their ways, Rich and Bo searched for a rock that might hide a key to the gate, but to no avail. Deciding they were stuck, with no way out, Rich called the Sheriff's department to ask for some help getting out. Around 11 p.m. that night, a deputy sheriff and the photography duo were flashing lights at each other. The deputy sheriff couldn't find his way down to Rich and Bo.

As is turns out, that night in the wild provided farm on the horizon and a lightning storm all at the same time. One of his photographs has at least three shooting stars, three lightning strikes and the lights of the wind towers in the same shot.

If it were a hunter looking for an elk, it would be like bagging a Boone and Crockett Club trophy. The next day ranchers let them through the gate,
