

Mother and son donate hair for children in need

By Liz Wood

On Nov. 25, Theresa Bokelman at Red Sage Spa cut off 20 inches of hair in a matter of minutes.

Sally Wells and her son Dallas have been growing their hair for Locks of Love and had it cut off to send in to the Locks of Love organization.

This is the third time Sally has grown her hair out and had it cut off for Locks of Love. It was the first for Dallas.

Sally has been growing her hair for four years, Dallas for three years.

After cutting their hair, Theresa put the hair in baggies for the mother and son to send to Locks of Love.

Locks of Love is a non-profit organization that provides hairpieces for financially disadvantaged children under the age of 21 in the United States and Canada, according to the locksoflove.org website.

Most of the children who benefit from the wigs suffer from a medical condition called alopecia areata, which has no known cause or cure, the website said.

The hairpieces are used to help restore the children's self-esteem and confidence.

The website recommends using a salon the donator is already familiar with to ensure their comfort when donating.

Wyoming's newspapers are home to a rich history of self-government in the form of public notices published over the last 120 years.

Unchanging and unchangeable, the state's paper and ink record of public notices is a permanent and complete record of government activities.

To allow for easy research of that history, the Wyoming Press Association has created www.wyopublicnotices.com - a web page carrying the legal notices published in most of the state's newspapers. This central repository of notices is being maintained as a public service - not as a replacement for legal notices in newspapers. Because the history of Wyoming is too important to take out of its newspapers.

A reminder of the importance of legal notices, brought to you by the Wyoming Press Association and
