State hard hit

has been a good story this year. Those numbers are good in terms of people visiting national parks," Robinson said.

But part of leisure and hospitality also had to do with miners, people involved in mining who were going to restaurants and staying at hotels. We've lost a lot of that business in the state and that has driven down the leisure and hospitality sector."

Even though visits to national parks and other vacation travel indicators are on the upswing, those gains do not offset the losses incurred in business travel.

The Prognosis

Wyoming's increasing unemployment, shrinking economic activity and increasing mortgage delinquency flies in the face of the rosier picture emerging across the nation as the US begins to pull out the recession that began in 2007.

The nation as a whole has an unemployment rate of 4.9 percent, on par with the approximately 5 percent unemployment rate at which many economists believe full employment has been reached.

The US economy, as a whole, is doing so well the Federal Reserve Bank's Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) has signaled that an increase in the target interest rate is on the way. The Federal Reserve can increase the target rate in order to prevent inflation.

When interest rates go up, spending by consumers and business sometimes decreases since it becomes more expensive to borrow money. Meant to cool the economy and prevent runaway inflation, it can chill already weakening economies such as Wyoming's.

"The Feds are waiting for a favorable jobs report and I think last month they got that," Robinson said, "And I don't believe they think that is going to change next month."

Robinson though, says he does not think a rate hike will harm Wyoming's economy, saying that the Fed has been signaling a potential rate increase for about a year now, and that such an increase has already been accounted for by markets.

But it's not clear if oil and mining jobs will be coming back. Oil, after a brief rally over the last week-and-half that pushed its price closer to $50 per barrel, tumbled Monday back toward the $40 per barrel mark as Iraq and Nigeria announced increased crude production, and China exported large quantities of refined fuel.

A price of $50 per barrel could make it more sustainable for more oil companies to begin extraction operations.

At the New York Mercantile Exchange on Monday, the price of oil closed down 3 percent, at $47.05 per barrel.

Coal demand is expected to continue to drop across the world, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration. According to the agency, demand for coal will continue to decrease nationally and worldwide in favor of alternate energy sources.

"About six months ago, when I was looking at the difference in oil and gas jobs in the state compared to a year ago, we were up to about 6,000-7,000 fewer jobs compared to a year ago," Robinson said. "Now we're down to about roughly 3,000 fewer jobs based on my June numbers."

"That doesn't sound so bad, you might say, 'We were down 6,000 but now we're only down 3,000,'" Robinson said. "But you have to remember as we go back twelve months, we're going back to a period in time that wasn't that great."

"We've been in the slide now for almost two years."
