business wanting an exception to the orders must submit a written application to the county health officer. If the county health officer believes that the plan is sufficient, then it will be forwarded onto the state health officer for approval. If the plan is approved by the state health officer, then counties are to document the exception by writing an exception approval letter signed by the county health officers. The opening of some of these businesses came a day after Carbon County reported it's fifth positive case of COVID-19. While there had been four other cases documented in recent weeks, none of them were residents of the county and are not counted towards the county. The fifth case is the first to be attributed to Carbon County in several weeks with the previous four cases being listed as recovered by both Carbon County Public Health and the Wyoming Department of Health. According to a situational debrief from Jacquelin Wells, public information officer for the Carbon County COVID-19 Incident Management Team, Carbon County Public Health is currently investigating 67 cases of COVID-like symptoms. Of those, 41 are listed as having recovered, four are hospitalized and 43 have been tested. As of Tuesday morning, the Wyoming Department of Health was reporting 444 lab-confirmed cases of COVID-19 in the state with 152 probable cases and seven deaths. The Wyoming Public Health Lab has processed 5,565 tests and commercial labs have processed 5,197. Platte County and Weston County are still the only two counties in the state that do not have a confirmed case of COVID-19. Fremont County has 128 confirmed cases and 9 possible cases, Laramie County has 104 confirmed cases and 54 possible cases, and Teton County has 67 confirmed cases and 31 possible cases.
